Ravens optimistic about 2016, urges unification

Jaxon Ravens, chair of the Washington State Democrats, is optimistic about 2016, he told the Metropolitan Democratic Club of Seattle at its April 8 meeting. He said it feels as if the “air is coming back into the room.” After the elections of 2004, he noted, it felt as if the “air had been sucked out of the room,” and Democrats felt a sense of deflation and defeat.

Since then, Mr Ravens said, the party has made progress on marriage equality, gun control, minimum wage, health care and environmental issues.

The values that drive the Democratic Party, he said, derive from what the Party is all about; faith, justice, labor unions, awareness of the world at large, celebration and fun. The Party is all about promoting progressive values and beliefs, he concluded.

To promote progressive values, we must elect Democrats, which means we must recruit and support good people to be candidates, he asserted, and to do that we need to attract volunteers and build a strong infrastructure and organization.

Where are we now? Mr Ravens asked and answered his own questions: “in locked battle.” The Republicans won’t even hear bills. What are we doing about it? Something the Party has never done before – considering communication paramount and assigning greater resources to developing data essential to improving communication.

He warned the audience about refusing to support a candidate because of one issue, adding that we have to be united in support of our candidates.

Honest Elections? Honestly!

Getting big money out of politics is the goal of more than one effort or campaign. Instead of trying to overturn Citizens United with a constitutional amendment, Honest Elections Seattle is using the initiative process. Seattle Initiative 122, explained MDC member Cleve Stockmeyer, a constitutional rights lawyer, aims to reform political campaigning with a system that uses Democracy Vouchers.

Every citizen would be given four $25 vouchers to donate to the candidate(s) of their choice, Mr Stockmeyer explained, and the candidate redeems the voucher for campaign funds. The candidates must qualify to receive the vouchers, he continued, by participating in six debates, abiding by spending limits, and other requirements.

Some of the advantages of this voucher system, Mr Stockmeyer said, are

- more regulation on money flowing into campaigns;
- maximum contributions are lowered from $700 to $500;
- more disclosure of campaign finances;
- signature gatherers are required to wear a badge if they are being paid;
- candidates may not accept contributions from any city contractor that earned more than $250,000 in the last two years; and

- elected officials are banned from lobbying the City for three years after leaving public service.

The cost is about $3 million a year, he said, and is based on property value; the owner of a $400,000 home would pay about $.85/month.

At the conclusion of his presentation, a motion was made to endorse the signature-gathering of the Honest Elections campaign. The membership will vote on the motion at its May 13 meeting.
